Cher Bart,

J'ai lu votre mémoire avec beaucoup d'intérêt. Votre réflexion sur la restitution du son est très intéressante. Et j'apprécie tout particulièrement que vous m'attribuez un sens de l'humour brittanique : c'est pour moi un très grand compliment !

Des expressions comme "stone the crows !" m'ont beaucoup amusé. Je trouve que vous ^^etes bien parvenu à restituer les différents niveaux de langage des personnages, et je suis ravi que nos paysans s'expriment avec l'accent du Somerset !

J'aurais cru les "GAW" compatibles avec l'Anglais... Mais je trouve vos "GOP" très convaincants, ainsi que les "drat!" et la plupart des solutions que vous avez trouvées à l'effroyable casse-t^ete de la traduction.

J'aurais quelques suggestions à vous proposer concernant certains passages :

La plupart des noms anglicisés me plaisent bien, à part peut-être "Longswelling", qui ne me semble pas trop approprié. Je préférerais un nom qui reste proche de la signification de gonfalon (étendard, bannière), quelque chose comme "Proudbanner" par exemple.

Pour le nom de la princesse, j'ai sans doute en effet été influencé par les sonorités d'Ophélie. Je pense qu'Ophelia fonctionnerait très bien (à moins que le nom n'ait trop de connotations shakespeariennes). Freya, avec sa sonorité viking, m'évoque plus^ot une guerrière.

- p10 - 4 Ici, "brave" n'est pas employé au sens de "bold", mais pour désigner quelqu'un d'aimable et un peu niais. "Good old Garulfo" fonctionnerait peut-être ?
- 14 - 7 "ça oui !" est employé pour affirmer avec force. L'équivalent je crois serait "for sure !"
- 19 - 4 "j'en avais assez" est ici employé dans le sens de "fed up with"
- 23 - 7 "tu t'es payé ma fiole" signifie en argot "tu t'es moqué de moi"
- 25 - 4 Il serait bon de garder l'idée de "caractériel"
- 31 - 1 Avec "c'est facile !" Garulfo signale à sa façon que le combat est inégal
- 32 - 6 Le comte excédé devient vulgaire. Son expression signifie "you're breaking my balls". Mais j'aime bien la sonorité de "pest" et "polliwog".
- 39 - 6 Je crois qu'il faudrait garder l'idée de "big frog" pour rappeler la myopie d'Anjalbert.
- 41 - 6 Je crois qu'il faudrait garder l'idée de "corps contrefait", c'est à dire "laid, monstrueux".

- 43 - 1 "trouver chaussure a leur pied" est une expression toute faite qui signifie "trouver quelqu'un à épouser"

Bravo pour votre excellent travail et merci pour cette passionnante lecture !

Amicalement,

Alain Ayroles

Bell, Anthea. 'Re: Asterix Picts - one last question.', 25 août 2014.

Yes, indeed it does sound like MacDo. The French wanted it, and although it doesn't sound the same to English ears it's harmless, and we were happy enough to oblige them. I'd had to explain at length what a caber is, as in tossing the caber, which Obelix is conspicuously doing on the front cover, and didn't need any more argument. I'd also argued for a bit of wordplay about the Apocrypha (ref. Maccabaeus combined with the old schoolboy joke about a book being black and white and re(a)d all over), but they wouldn't have that on the grounds that no one reads the Bible any more. Well, we do in English because the King James version is one of the great glories of English literature. I'm afraid I don't know about the Bible in the French vernacular. In German Luther intentionally kept it down-to-earth, almost rustic sometimes, recalling Tyndale's wish for any ploughboy to know the Bible as well as the great and learned clerics. I think I got to keep everything else I wanted.

Did I tell you about the two good German students at Heidelberg studying for their diplomas in translation and interpreting? I answered all their questions, ten years apart. They were very bright, especially the second, Christa Claussen, now living in Luxembourg with her Italian husband and two presumably multilingual children. Christa compared the French saga complete, including the Uderzo-only albums, with the translations in German, English, Italian and Catalan. I still have her thesis, complete with tables of comparative names and passages of wordplay.

It will be interesting to see what the new team comes up with next. I wouldn't be surprised if they stick with the old pattern of home and away matches.

I'd love to see your dissertation.

Very Best

Anthea

Dear Bart

Sorry not to have replied sooner. I think what you are really asking is whether I have any system for translating Asterix noises, and the answer is no. In fact it became gradually most acceptable to keep the French noises unless there was some good reason not to, such as accents. Originally, it was vital to confine oneself to black lettering entirely, which of course included lettering inside speech bubbles. For all I know it would be easier, with modern methods, to change, but I'm not sure. We rely a lot on the brilliant letterer Bryony, who devised an electronic alphabet for Asterix that looks like hand-lettering, and impressed even the French when Orion showed it to them.

I can hardly believe that your son Max is told off for reading too much - how shocking. Rowling deserves a lot of credit for getting boys as well as girls reading, but your son sounds like a self-starter who naturally falls upon the written word.

Best wishes

Anthea

———. 'Re: Asterix, Etc.', 23 avril 2014.

Dear Bart

Many thanks for your letter, and your very kind remarks about the Astérix translations. I will go straight to the point, where you suggest, acutely and indeed accurately, that I probably read aloud my translation to see (or rather hear) how it sounds. Or at least, I am always reading it aloud in my head, so to speak. And not only with the BD genre. It is so much second nature to me by now that I do it even with non-fiction. I certainly do it with fiction, which is probably my favourite genre for translation because I like tackling dialogue, and for that one needs an ear for the rhythms of speech in any given language. For nine years I was on the jury panel for the annual Schlegel-Tieck prize for translation from German to English. It's difficult, of course, to judge across genres as one must with these prizes, which have works of fiction and a wide variety of non-fiction entered, as well as poetry – but in the field of fiction it was easy to spot which translators could write natural dialogue in English and which couldn't.

And then there are the other constraints peculiar to the BD: the words can't spill out of the speech bubble, and ought not to be conspicuously too short to fill it satisfactorily, and though freedom is allowed in the substitution of jokes they must fit the situation and the expressions on the characters' faces. I remember corresponding with two excellent German students of translation about the Astérix books, one of them in fact bi-lingual French/German, a German father and a French mother, and answered all the questions they asked. But they didn't ask about the point of the frame in the very first album on the very first page, where les Romains ont perdu leur latin. Alas, we don't have that expression in English – German does, so it was no problem for my friend Gudrun Pennendorf who did all the early German albums. So I had two of the bruised Roman soldiers "declining" grammatically in Latin to show an expression in more than one case, adding "We decline" and "Accidence will happen". That first album was rather short of jokes compared to its successors; later Goscinny thought up better jokes than the mere fact that the Romans speak Latin. When I saw the dissertation of one of the German students, I found that she had spotted the pun on "accidents" and "accidence" but didn't see the point of it. Funny spelling, she commented, or something like that.

(My son Oliver Kamm, a leader writer on the Times, has a book about modern developments in the English language coming out this autumn; he's entitled it Accidence Will Happen, and I wondered if he would have any difficulty with permission, but luckily it's for Weidenfeld & Nicolson, also part of Orion, so that's all right.)

Ah, you have noticed the songs in the new album by the new author/artist team. Yes, the French ones are pop songs. The policy has always been to adapt rather than just translate – I'm dreaming of a white solstice, for instance, and that seemed to get around questions of copyright. But the modern pop songs in the French originals were a new departure, and I have to say that a purely practical matter came into it: the editor at Orion realized that permission would have to be asked and probably paid for in order to use songs still in copyright. So Editions Albert René said we could stick to the more traditional stuff in English. As the story is set in Scotland, there was plenty of that. And it is more, well, in tune with usage in the English versions so far.

I like The Laurel Wreath too – indeed, all those middle-period albums when Goscinny was still alive and Uderzo's draughtsmanship had become extremely sophisticated. I did two talks at the Glasgow Literary Festival about three years ago – one on Astérix, the other on the Austrian writer Stefan Zweig – and met another speaker who had worked on the Doctor Who TV series. My twin granddaughters are great fans. Apparently an episode not so long before, in which the Doctor in his Matt Smith incarnation visited Rome, was based on The Laurel Wreath. I thought it had seemed strangely familiar.

Is/are any of your children girls? I ask because Astérix is thought of as exclusively for boys, so I am very glad when girls like him as well. I had a lovely letter once from an Australian teenage girl, who said she had loved the series, and what could she read next? I suggested the Roman detective stories of Lindsey Davis.

With very best wishes

Anthea

Grove, Laurence. 'Re: Translating Bande Dessinée', 7 août 2013.

Hi Bart,

I've had a quick look over your mémoire, and it is impressive. A lot of personal material, a broad ranging question, then specifically applied to the example you have chosen. I could imagine other case studies, such as Titeuf, of many of the translations now produced by Cinebook: <http://www.cinebook.co.uk>

For the Astérix reference, I would suggest you start with Le Tour du monde d'Astérix, ed Rouvière.

As the project goes on, you may consider submitting something to European Comic Art. We welcome up and coming academics!

Cheers

Bart,

It's the summer session here after what turned out to be a taxing end to our spring semester between my classes, my administrative responsibilities, a temporary office move, and an enormous amount of translations to knock out. I'm off tomorrow to do a week's worth of test-grading in Cincinnati and am actually regarding it as something of a vacation. My partner Greg and I will have a longer vacation in juillet at the beach in Florida, close to my childhood home.

When I was working on my master's degree at the University of South Carolina, I had the opportunity to be part of an exchange program with the Fac des Lettres and Fac des Sciences Économiques et Sociales in Mulhouse as a lecteur d'anglais from 1988-1990. Back then, we were allowed to extend for a second year, if we wanted and, presumably, if the Mulhouse folks wanted to keep us. It was an experience that played into this translation venture of mine, for I was assigned to teach classes of theme and enjoyed the activity thoroughly. I'll never forget the time my students asked if a particular translation was "of" with one "f" or two. Mulhouse wasn't the prettiest city in Alsace, but I had a lovely experience there and would have gladly stayed on, if my contract would have allowed. I loved my life there.

I had hoped that I still had my translation drafts for Le Combat ordinaire on one of my two computers, but alas, no. The reason I would like to have had them is that, once I send the drafts in, the editor(s) at NBM sometimes make changes of which I'm not necessarily aware, for I seldom go back and read the translation once they're out. Once this less to an unhappy occurrence: I did the Classics Illustrated Deluxe edition of Frankenstein. In my translation, I spelled the author's name correctly as Shelley; at some point afterwards, it got changed to the more modern American spelling of Shelly, much to the justifiable annoyance of some reviewers. In looking at some of your examples of phonemes in Le Combat, I saw one that I didn't put in myself: "furners" which is stereotypically redneck American pronunciation of "foreigners" and conveys a hostility towards them. I'm certain that Terry Nantier opted to put that in. On the other hand, I would indeed put "helluva." When I first started working for NBM some 17 years ago, Terry gave me some direction as to what register he wanted me to use in a translation. Over time, as I gained more confidence in what I was doing, I think I started having a sort of internal voice about how I would translate something, like I could hear in my mind how they characters might talk.

In response to your questions, which are all very interesting. You're making me realize that in many ways I'm not consciously systematic about how I do some things, but have semi-conscious norms that I've established over the years.

1) Unfortunately, I am not familiar with the Astérix translations by Ms. Bell, for I've only ever read those tales in French. Without being familiar with what Richet and Delesse have said, may I ask if they are well-positioned to determine when a translation is satisfying in English? Do they themselves speak English? When you say how a source text is meant to "sound" to a reader, was that in the original language or in the translated language? I'm guessing you mean the latter. I admit that it had not occurred to me read the texts aloud to check how they sound specifically in the original, although I certainly would do so if I were doing critical analysis of a poem for my research writing. For translating, I tend almost always to favor meaning first and conveying that with sounds, and then to opt for what I hope would be a natural way of saying something in English for the imagined/intended audience. With respect to "repeated phonemes," your example is making my think I need to figure out how to represent a schwa in a word like thanks...since we'd hesitate on a vowel or semi-vowel sound rather than a voiced consonant like "th."

2) "Eye dialect:" Without knowing for sure, I'm betting "whuping" was a spelling mistake that occurred in the lettering or that the editor added, which sometimes happens. That's a common, rural pronunciation in the South of the US where I'm from and have lived the bulk of my life, but I'd have spelled it "whooping." As a note, Terry is originally from France, but came to the US as student in the 1970s and has lived the bulk of his "American" life in New York City, which of course has a very different accent and dialect than my own, so he may well change some spellings to what he thinks more accurately represents the sound for an "eye dialect." The decision for me to use such words depends on the register in the original. If I see that the characters are using very conversational French then I do the same in English, to convey how we pronounce things rather than how we might do in formal writing...I do make a judgment based on the character, but it's very much linked to the register in the original.

3) With respect to lyrics, I defer to the editors' wishes. If it's a well-known song in French, we'd probably leave it in the original; if a popular English-language version of the same song exists, then we might go with that. If it's an original song or poem, then I usually translated it, attempting to keep as much meaning as possible and having a rhyme, too (I'm thinking of my Smurfs translations, in this instance.). If the French song original isn't important as such, I'd translate it.

4) When I first started working with NBM, many of the sounds in the panels were part of the artwork, or at least that's what I thought at the time. Once, a reviewer roundly criticized a translation we did for a Schuiten-Peeters volume where a character kept coughing, which the French represented as "theu." From my perspective, that wasn't in a speech bubble, so I didn't know we could alter it and the press didn't ask me to do so. Now, however, with NBM, Papercutz, and Bamboo, we almost always translate those kinds of sounds as a matter of course. Usually, if it's a sound that would be recognizable to an English speaker, I'll leave it largely alone, though I may alter the spelling....for instance, if a phone was indicated as touloulou...I'd keep the same sound, but change to "oolooloo" so that a reader will imagine the sound as intended in the original, this "beep" for "bip." My first desire is to have a spelling that a native English speaker will understand immediately. It's also a matter of space. With "clic," I've moved towards spelling it "clik" if the space for the sound is limited to 4 characters.

5) I almost always respect the original's punctuation marks, unless I think there's been a mistake (as an aside, you must keep in mind that mistakes do exist in the original. Sometimes I can communicate with the original author to confirm that, sometimes not.) With exclamation points and questions marks, I seldom if ever change them. With ellipses, it's a very different matter. In French, they're wanting to convey that the speaker is trailing off, that the thought's not complete, etc. In American usage, we generally only use that to convey that something has been removed from the text. So far, it's been something of a house decision. Terry, at NBM, wants me to be very sparing with them and largely regard them as a period (full stop!). If it's a sentence fragment or a hesitation by the speaker, then I leave it. What I would truly prefer to do is to convey that sense from the French as an em dash— but Terry doesn't want that symbol. I do that pretty systematically in Papercutz translations and in Bamboo translations however.

I hope these questions will arrive in time to be of service to you, and I apologize for my laggardness in responding. Feel free to ask my further questions, if you need. I'll be much quicker to respond now. Greg and I will be in Alsace in juillet 2015, if you're around.

I have attached an updated CV for you, if you need that sort of info for your descriptions of the translators in your project.

Sincerely,

Joe

-----.'RE: Le Combat Ordinaire', 25 octobre 2013.

Dear Bart,

I would be happy to try to answer some questions for your thesis. Without me yet pulling out the originals and the translations of Le Combat ordinaire to compare them, let me caution you in one respect, sometimes the translation cannot affect those sound representations if they're part of the artwork of the plate. If they're part of the speech bubble, I don't think it's a problem. Having said that, shoot away with your questions.

I began translating as a secondary source of income while I was still a graduate student like yourself, and did work for Barron's Educational and Polity Press in the U.K. By happenstance, I was asked to finish an incomplete translation for NBM Publishing (which is owned and run by a French expatriate and has been publishing translations of European BD in the USA since the mid-1970s). The editor was sufficiently happy with my work, that I've been working for them ever since, and work regularly for their sister press Papercutz, which focuses more on a market for children and teenagers. Most recently, I've been doing some work directly for Bamboo in France.

Why do I continue to do so?

1. First and foremost, it's fun work: I've loved comic books ever since I was a child and find it profoundly stimulating to work closely on this manifestation of Francophone culture. Sometimes I'm working on books by people or adaptations of famous authors who have been dead many years, but sometimes I also get to work on volumes by contemporary bédéistes, which is also rewarding.

2. Secondly, it's a nice secondary source of income on top of my salary as a professor (for which I do earn "proper" money!). In American culture, many people have their principal occupation, but also do something else "on the side" to earn additional funds. For me, as one of my colleagues puts it, it's a hobby that makes money, much like I do as a staff singer in a church choir or as a painter selling my canvases.

3. Thirdly, the translations count as publications for me as a professor, for they are the result of my scholarship as a professor of French and Spanish. We are expected to publish regularly as scholars. Translations are not the only thing that I do, however, in that vein. I will attach a copy of my current CV so that you can see some of the other translations that I've done, as well as get a better idea of my scholarly agenda with respect to publication and presentations.

I look forward to reading your questions.

By the way, more than 20 years ago, I was a "lecteur d'anglais" at the fac in Mulhouse for two years. I love Alsace!

Sincerely,

Joe

Kaindl, Klaus. 'Re: Translating Bande Dessinée', 7 septembre 2013.

Dear Bart Hulley,

Thank you for the abstract of your thesis. It really reads interesting and I agree that the auditive dimension of comics is largely neglected in studies on comics (translation).

Concerning the "hypothèse théorique": you do not really clearly mention any theoretical framework - the (problematic) assumption that translating comics has mainly to do with equivalence is not really a theoretical framework. Especially the translation of onomatopoeia is very often not provided by the translator of the other verbal elements but by the editor.

So I would suggest that you look for a broader (e.g. semiotic, descriptive, sociological) framework for your thesis in order to take into account the many (aesthetic, economic etc.) factors.

Another important aspect which needs to be made explicit is the question of method: is your investigation prescriptive or descriptive (i.e. is the aim of your study to answer to the question how translation SHOULD be done or how translation IS done)?

In your concluding remarks you state that I did not take into account the acoustic dimension - as far as I remember I explicitly link in the article in Target onomatopoeia and typography to the acoustic dimension. In my book (in German) on comics translation I dedicated several pages to the creation of sound in comics....

So far my comments, my best wishes for your thesis and kind regards.

Meyer, Jean-Paul. 'Votre Mémoire', 16 septembre 2013.

Cher Monsieur Hulley,

Comme je vous l'avais promis, j'ai lu votre projet de recherche. Je peux même dire que je l'ai lu très attentivement tant il pose de problèmes scientifiques à mon avis. Je vous en donne quelques éléments ci-dessous. Je pense qu'il est de mon devoir de vous dire ça, même si cela peut être difficile à admettre pour vous.

1) Questions de « bédéologie »

Dans votre étude, vous considérez le discours des protagonistes comme une bande-son. Cela est fondamentalement erroné. Le texte de la BD, comme toutes les autres formes littéraires comportant de la mimèse, est un discours rapporté. Bien sûr, il inclut à ce titre tous les paramètres et toute la complexité de l'énonciation. C'est bien ce qui en fait un véritable et passionnant objet d'étude. Mais voir un caractère pseudo-sonore dans cela est un postulat fautif, ce que de nombreuses études ont montré, notamment en établissant que l'échange de parole constitue une pseudo-oralité et la transcription sémiographique des bruits un effet de réel.

De ce point de vue, l'interprétation que vous faites de la citation de Hergé (p. 6 du mémoire) est un contresens. Le père de Tintin y parle de la dimension iconique du récit, à contrecourant des « histoires en images » qui ont longtemps marqué les débuts de la BD européenne, et non d'une quelconque dimension sonore. Les auteurs qui citent cette déclaration de Hergé (en l'occurrence Groensteen 1999 et Peeters 1998) ne s'y trompent pas d'ailleurs.

J'ajoute pour conclure ce point que votre problématique de recherche fait fausse route dès le départ. Vous y proposez de « [prendre] en compte les lecteurs de bande dessinée comme auditeurs » (p. 23), ce qui constitue une pétition de principe.

2) Question de lecture

Vos déclarations en matière de lecture sont déconnectées des références scientifiques du domaine. Vous fondez en effet votre postulat de recherche sur le fait que « la bande sonore de bande dessinée [...] porte une valeur auditive représentée graphiquement et intonée intérieurement en accompagnement de la lecture visuelle et silencieuse ». Je concède qu'on puisse à la rigueur discuter la question d'une valeur auditive ; la représentation des bruits s'apparente dans la BD aux métaphores visuelles des premières idéographies et comporte donc à ce titre une image acoustique. En revanche, la question de la lecture « intonée intérieurement en accompagnement de la lecture visuelle et silencieuse » est complètement fausse, et éliminée depuis les travaux sur la lecture rapide des années 1970 (Foucambert, Richaudeau, La Garanderie, Fijalkow, pour ne citer que des Français).

3) Questions d'analyse linguistique

Je m'étonne de ne trouver dans votre projet aucune synthèse ni aucune piste d'investigation sur la question du bruit dans la langue. Le sujet n'est pas nouveau, il intéresse beaucoup de monde depuis Platon (cf. Cratyle), et de grands linguistes du 20e siècle se sont disputés là-dessus, notamment en s'opposant les notions d'arbitraire du signe ou de référence au réel. Le bruit pose des problèmes qui vont bien au-delà du son : morphologie, sémantique, lexiculture, etc. Il me semble qu'une étude proposant de travailler sur la matière sonore de la BD devrait d'abord réfléchir sur la place faite à la matière sonore dans la description du langage.

4) Questions de sémiotique

Enfin, je m'étonne tout autant que vous ne vous intéressiez qu'au traitement phonétique des onomatopées, sans avoir au préalable réfléchi sur le statut sémiotique de ces unités. En effet, s'il s'agit de signes, ce qui reste encore à étayer, quelle est leur substance? Sont-elles analysables de manière dénotative? Leur connotation n'est-elle que sonore? Quels sont les rapports entre leur dimension scripturale et leur dimension graphique ? Leur aspect figuré est-il normalisé ? etc.

Voilà, cher Bart Hulley, ce que j'avais à vous dire. Comme vous le voyez, les critiques et les désaccords dont je vous fais part relèvent de mon champ de recherche habituel. Je n'entre pas dans la discussion concernant vos choix de traduction, bien que plusieurs de ces choix me paraissent contestables. Mais ça, c'est l'affaire du traductologue.

Restant à votre disposition, je vous adresse mes salutations.

Hi Bart.

A couple of things occurred to me this morning. I'm sorry that I got back late last night and won't have time to read your piece in detail just at the moment, so you may already have integrated these points into it. But if not, it would be worth checking out academic literature on eye dialect and on phonaesthetics.

Yours,

Saincantin, Jerome. 'RE: Houba houba', 28 avril 2014.

Well, sound-wise, I felt 'hubba' was a safer bet than 'houba' (which I assumed people would pronounce 'howba'). I hadn't realised that 'hubba hubba' was so well known as an expression of... 'approval, excitement or pleasure', apparently - and I took some flak from reviewers already about it! I'm still not certain how people pronounce 'houba' in English, either...

-----.'RE: Website Contact:Marsupilami Thieves', 14 avril 2014.

Hi Bart,

Here are my somewhat overdue answers to your questions. My apologies for the delay, I occasionally get very, very bad with correspondence and scheduling...

So, without further ado:

1. Yes, I do believe you're right in that regard. When it comes to phonetic onomatopoeia (which is a word I'm sure I'll know how to spell at some point before I die) it really pays to pronounce the word aloud and attempt to get close in the target language. And I do it – not systematically, but anytime I sense a problem or find something particularly strange.

Some sound effects, however, in some comics, are represented by onomatopoeia that are not phonetic but aren't exactly standard. The best example, and one of my favourite sounds in BD, is one used several times by Tome & Janry in their run of Spirou: krabardaf – used generally for people falling down. It's definitely not a classic one, and the sound itself is... Well, you get it from context, but it's not exactly the sound a person makes when they roll down a flight of stairs. One reason it's among my favourite BD sound effects is that (I think) it sounds funny in French. I'd be hard pressed to explain why, but it has a humorous sound all by itself, which lends itself well to the tone of the comic.

Translating such a sound demands, as you put it, an appreciation of how the source text is meant to sound to the reader – but it goes deeper than mere phonetics. In this case, part of how it 'sounds' is no doubt the result of cultural factors – including a host of 'classic', set onomatopoeia (ouah ouah, pan, vroom – all those that are instantly recognisable as the sound of a dog, gun or car – regardless of how the actual dog, gun or car would sound), pop culture references, etc...

2. It might be a consequence of our editorial policy (a mix of old and recent series; often alternating, for a given series, between older and newer titles; pre-selection of said series – meaning our catalogue isn't an accurate cross-section of the French comic world right now), but I don't think this is a recent tendency. I'm fairly sure Eye Dialect has been used consistently throughout the existence of BD. Some authors use it, others don't. In fact, at least one aspect of it you're LESS likely to find nowadays is 'racial' dialect – the pirate lookout in Asterix who fails to pronounce his Rs, Chinese characters turning them into Ls, etc... With the advent of political correctness, this type of things is seriously frowned upon, and less common nowadays (we often don't translate it, for example, as it gets a bad rap in the US).

So, no, not a recent trend as far as I can tell.

3. Ha! That's the big question. Some of the things that factor in my decisions:

- similarity of sounds pre- and post-translation. CRRRC is read pretty much the same way in either language, for example.
- feasibility of modifying the picture. Sometimes the sound effect is embedded so thoroughly in the art that modifying it would require way too much work. Even if it's borderline, we might end up leaving it (this has led, for example, to us slowly accepting PAW as an appropriate sound for a shot in English, even though it's a tad weird, and was something our American proofreader detested; but several times we just couldn't modify some instances in the art, and so left it throughout a book, then a series...)
- the adequacy of the sound in French to start with. IIIIIICRR, for example, is perfectly understandable – but to me it sounds weird. IIIIIIIIII would be a proper phonetic representation of the sound the door makes – but it doesn't actually make a CRR sound at the end, and so using the classic CREEAK seemed just as efficient in the situation.

- the existence in English of a classic onomatopoeia of very similar spelling: CLIC and CLICK. English readers would obviously understand CLIC, but might find it jarring when they're used to seeing it spelled CLICK.

The truth in the matter is that I don't have a clear-cut rulebook on how to proceed. A good deal of our decisions are based on experience and rational notions, but a fair amount are due to gut feeling. IIIIIICRR felt wrong, for example. It'd still have been perfectly understandable, but it felt wrong.

It's entirely possible that such an approach is not at all the best one possible...

One thing worth noting is that Cinebook translations are a group effort. I do the bulk of the work, but there's always a proofreader involved, who has a good amount of work to do to make sure my English is correct, and our supervisor also checks the process. It means that some of the decisions I make – or fail to make – can be challenged by someone else. Sometimes it's because my pronunciation is off, sometimes it's (as I pointed out) because a modification isn't feasible... More often than not, it's because someone will have a different gut feeling about such and such onomatopoeia.

4. Huh... I don't...

The five instances of additions you noted appear on the French PDF I worked from. I didn't add them... A version problem, maybe? A printing error in your French copy? (We had a couple of instances of such problems back when I first started; I'd work from printed books, often early editions, and there'd be discrepancies with the more recent PDFs the rest of the team was working from...)

As for the 'claps', my translation document has the comment [no changes] regarding the first two pictures containing clapping, with a note to apply throughout. Either these instructions were lost during lettering, or there was a... a 'layer' hitch? I'm not entirely sure about the lettering/printing process. In any case, none of those anomalies are due to a translating choice.

5. Oh dear...

This is an embarrassing example of why I have a long way to go before I can call myself a translator without blushing...

The truth is, while I intellectually recognised the intent of the name, the fact that it was supposed to be mañana... I obviously failed to apply it. I read it out loud, in French, the English way – and therefore didn't see the point in changing the spelling, since obviously it'd be the same, right?

Good grief. It'd be less mortifying if I'd failed to see it at all (even though I do speak Spanish), but I did; it just absolutely did not connect with my decision.

Chalk this one up to pure and simple stupidity...

Well, there you are. I hope my musings will be of some use to you. If you have further questions or need clarifications, don't hesitate to contact me!

----- 'RE: Website Contact:Marsupilami Thieves', 19 octobre 2013.

Hi Bart,

As a matter of fact, Saint Quentin probably is the origin of my name - as it is pronounced the exact same way in French. Family legend claims that our ancestor around the 1780s was an impoverished noble (aristocrats often had names in Saint Something) who sold his title to buy a pair of oxen and work what land he had left. If that's true, it would explain the... 'commonerisation' of the name, as well as show we're a lucky bunch - since we survived 1789 and the ensuing head-chopping fever!

^_^\n

Well, no worries on the critiquing. It's up to you of course - although you're entirely free to offer your opinion as a reader of comics, rather than as a thesis writer.

Concerning your choice of titles, Long John Silver and The Marsu Thieves are 'mine' (and I cannot recommend reading Long John Silver enough - for the sheer pleasure of one of the most outstanding series I've read in a LOOONG time). I've taken over Iznogoud since our tome seven, but when we acquired the rights for the series they came with the rights to the previous translations from other publishers - by Anthea Bell and Derek Hockridge themselves! I can assure you that taking over from THAT pair was a rather daunting prospect...

The technical process... Let's see...

- I (or the other translator, or course) receive the order for the next batch of translations.

- I grab the pdf of the comic and start translating bubble by bubble, as a word document (is that what you mean by package?), leaving notes on things that seem weak, icky or worthy of a second look
- After the whole text has been translated, I re-read a few times, go through my notes and correct/change/research what needs to be.
- Once I'm satisfied, I send the doc to the supervisor, who checks it, sends it back with her questions, then forwards my answers to the proofreader...
- We go on sending the doc file back and forth, increasing version number, until we're satisfied. At that point, my contribution is mostly over, except when we catch other mistakes we hadn't seen earlier.
- From what I know of the process, the doc file is then sent to the letterer, who creates a new pdf file (or modifies the original, I'm not sure) using our text. Occasionally we have to review some things at that point to fit the speech bubbles.
- When the pdf is complete, the supervisor goes through it again to check it thoroughly, at which point I often get a request for a confirmation or two on such and such point.
- Finally, once the pdf is checked, we send it to a couple of British volunteers who've had nothing to do with the process so far, so they can check the fluidity of the final product, and catch the occasional typo.
- Once their suggestions have been integrated and the pdf checked one last time, I believe it goes to the printer.

I'm not 100% on the last four steps here, as all I know of them is the occasional remark in passing by the supervisor when she's got a question for me. At that point I'm usually neck deep into another title anyway.

Anyway, hopefully that helps you; if you need more details or have other questions, go ahead and ask!

J.

Hi Bart,

No no, Jerome Saincantin is my real name!

Yeah, I know the golden rule, and I do feel somewhat guilty breaking it, but...
Here's how it happened.

Cinebook had three translators at the time I applied, all British or American. One was in the process of leaving. My good timing meant I was given a chance to try out as a potential replacement.

The important bit, of course, is that we translate in teams. One of us is the main translator, yes, does the bulk of the job, but a French/English supervisor does a first check, mostly for typos or obvious mistakes, then the text goes to a proofreader of the opposite language (a native English speaker when I'm the translator, myself when one of them is the translator) and everything is checked, any mistakes corrected, and differences of opinion discussed back and forth with the supervisor also chiming in until everyone's happy. Then we have a couple of native English-speakers doing another re-read to make sure.

So, when I tried out, yes, I translated the wrong way, and it told. But the team as a whole also considered I'd produced something that was more fluid and free-flowing than previous attempts, and I was kept on board.

Believe me, if we weren't working as a team, I wouldn't try to do the job on my own. I'm acutely aware of the dangers of going in the wrong direction! But the way we do it, with a team that works well together and is comfortable with the process, I think it works. Not saying someone else couldn't do it better, but I do believe we're doing a good job. We're certainly trying, and taking it seriously.

As far as I know, none of it has anything to do with Cinebook's market strategy. If anything, I'd say it has to do rather with the alchemy between the various actors involved. The company's small and everybody knows everybody. It's important in such a case that we all get along, personally as well as professionally.

There. Hope that answers your question - and that you're not put off too badly by our practices! If you've read some of our titles, actually, I'd appreciate your honest opinion on our work; are we performing well? Are our translations good? Or should I commit ritual seppuku to atone for my crimes against the English language and the spirits of the comics world?

If you have any other questions, don't hesitate to ask. :)

All the best,

J.

Spear, Luke. 'Re: Les Rugbymen', 30 juillet 2014

Hi Bart,

Back from Cornwall now - mini-break over! Quick note to reply to your Beka question - I wasn't really aware of the dual identity. I knew it was a pseudonym but didn't follow up. I was aware it was dual-signed, but assumed that might have been more of an artist/writer relationship.

As such I'm not sure to what extent the dual-writing had an impact on the final text. I daresay a mix of styles and voice is detectable in the source, now that you mention it, but that could be hindsight bias of some description. Sorry I can't be more helpful in this direction.

How are things coming along?

Luke

----- 'Re: Les Rugbymen', 16 juillet 2014

Hi Bart,

I've paraphrased your questions for my own benefit. Leaving them in if they're any use for context etc.

1. Do I agree with hypothesis (cartoons need in-depth reading and sub-vocalisation, not speed reading), and do I read source texts and/or translations aloud to check how they sound?

I'll add this answer at the end, if that's alright with you.

2. Why did I drop the aitches? Any difficulty imagining how Coach should sound?

You've certainly picked a text that was full of challenges. From unfamiliar songs and sounds, creative language use in French through to the representation of British English speakers in French. The French BD stereotype of the British speaking both natively and in French has this curious 'w' sound replacing the 'r's (P.22 in source).

Perhaps it's a representation of a non-rolled R, a softer Received Pronunciation interpretation that is quite audible to French speakers, a phonic tic, did you call it? This is also quite prevalent in the Clifton series, for example. We obviously don't think that of ourselves. We pronounce our Rs exactly as they should be pronounced! But when representing Brits in dialogue, in French, this is quite a common French pattern.

Similarly then, this coach is a 'rrrrreal and earrrrthy' Frenchman, rolling away with abandon. This obviously makes no sense to carry over into the English, unless he was supposed to be of West Country or other diverse-regional-UK-accent-area origin. Cue the creation of an accent particular to the coach. I grew up in the West Country, so am quite familiar with those sounds. I think, if memory serves (nearly a decade has passed!), I opted for a regional accent of equal 'earthiness' to the original, to convey the coach's character, thus the Wes' Coun'ry burr that fades in and out throughout his dialogue. I don't have the translation to hand to confirm this, and will modify my response if I'm wrong, but that ought to be the case.

3. Why not replicate spelling of French to English in national anthem?

I think my main aim here was just to convey the passion in the singing in a way that native English speakers (particularly young readers) would recognise. Moreover, I think there's a language of 'pronunciation extensions' in English comics that is subtle, but ever present. Finally, it wouldn't really be a translation if I left French orthographical conventions representing, for instance, liaison, in place.

Based on the above, I cleaned up the 'Z'ENFANTS', as so few English speakers are aware that liaison happens in French pronunciation it would just be a distraction rather than convey anything meaningful. Likewise for 'PATRIII-IEUU' which is clearly the French standard pronunciation of certain 'e' endings. Hard to do in English, and more of a distraction again. The uppercase/bold type and lengthening of PATRIII-IE' serves to partly convey the passion of the performance. As for the GLOIIIIIRE vs GLOOOOOIRE, the aforementioned language of 'pronunciation extensions' dictates that the OOOOOO is lengthened in this case, rather than the I. I can't explain this, it is intuitive. Perhaps I'm trying to relate the word more closely to 'glory' for the reader's sake, or perhaps my mind is so steeped in childhood Beanos and American superheroes that a distant memory is guiding my work subconsciously.

Or it just looked better to me at the time.

4. Prefer: translate lyrics or replace with existing lyrics?

Out of those two options, finding an existing related/same song in the target language is the ideal for me. But is extremely rare. Translating the words themselves is not enough, and would rarely work, 9 out of 10 times you would need to employ 'transcreation' to keep meaning, rhyme and metre to some degree. So I tend to opt for the third option: making up new lyrics based on the old. A made up French rugby song in English doesn't break the reader's suspension of disbelief if it seems genuine and fits the context of the scene.

Again, I don't have the translation on me right now, but can expand depending on how fitting this reply is!

5. How do you decide what to use in the translation, or whether to translate at all?

As I've mentioned to you elsewhere I'm quite an auditory thinker/reader, so these onomatopeia (of which this particular title has an incredible abundance) call out for special attention from me. They are part of the joy of comic books, recreating sounds and scenes in the mind's eyes and ears. I had an informal process, of sorts, for handling these.

If the sound is creative or interesting, doesn't have a ready alternative in English, AND pronunciation works in the same/similar way in English, I'll prefer to leave it. This is to respect the artist's intentions as closely as possible and also to help to introduce new audio elements to the English onomatopeic language. Alas, so few sounds fit into that category.

'Obolom' must have been one of those. I suppose 'rumble/rmmble' would have worked nicely, but I must have been quite taken with the heavy and chaotic sounds of 'Obolom' at the time! There's also a need for the graphiste to be able to make the change cleanly – in onomatopeia outside of speech bubbles, for instance. If it's a borderline call on the change, and it's a real challenge for the graphiste, some compromises were made. That was rare, though. We didn't work closely, always via an intermediary, so I had to offer my advice and leave it at that. I seem to remember not all of my translations making it through the whole process, despite detailed attention being paid by everyone at each stage.

If I do decide to translate a sound, which is the case most of the time, it's normally because conventions already exist for that particular element. There is a language of onomatopeia that is readily recognisable to frequent comic readers. This applies equally to French, and to all other languages with a comic tradition, I'm sure. From the obvious plouf/splash, or paf/(range of hitting sounds), to the less obvious non-standard but implied sounds made in French, of which this particular comic had so many. These all require an audio audition in the mind to play out the scene with the sound and adjust it as required to make it realistic. Then the English version needs forming, prioritising standard phrasing and existing terms. The fact that so many alternative onomatopeia were offered in the source for the same sounds in this particular album was a sign to me to proceed in the spirit of being flexible and creative with the sounds being made.

FIRST QUESTION ANSWERED LAST

As the above indicates, I do agree that comic book translation requires an in-depth analysis to produce a work that is not only meaning-accurate (in some specific situations that isn't even the core requirement) but, slightly more importantly, fun and engaging, closely following the spirit of the text, just as the law is interpreted by judges in undocumented legal situations.

It'll probably be clear by now that I do audition everything written, particularly the sounds, in my mind at least, sometimes even vocalising in a whisper. On that note, I occasionally used voice-recognition to input my translation, but this rarely works well for onomatopeia, or any word not found in the dictionary, so mental and slightly-vocalised auditions were the norm. There are also other pitfalls with this input method, so close proofreading multiple times was essential if used.

As a general note to finish, publishers should support this in-depth analysis of the source comic by recognising and investing in ability, experience and awareness in this area among translators, even promoting it as a selling point. Literary translation is renowned for undervaluing translators and sadly this is the case in the comic book scene also.

It's difficult for translation buyers/publishers on a few levels – they can rarely judge the quality of translations for themselves, relying only on natives not trained in translation or sales figures that are based on a plethora of other variables, both cases giving a poor indication of translation quality. Nor can they easily appreciate the potential return on investment of translations that are compelling and conducive to word of mouth sales and reputation.

I had a distinct feeling at Cinebook that, time and time again, being correct to the word was paramount and any deviation from that was a slight to the creative work of the author, also jeopardising sales. There was little appreciation for creative solutions to obviously awkward ‘word for word’ situations. The CEO/MD/PDG once told me that we were translating BDs, not ‘de la grande littérature’. Hrrmph! More enlightened publishers, we can only hope for.

Such publishers should really now be embracing modern technology, providing translators with an editable text version of the book, instead of a PDF version. All translatable parts can be provided in digital text format to enable the translator to seamlessly work across multiple projects in their CAT tools, never needing to take 5 minutes to cross reference a once mentioned character 5 volumes previously. Concordance searches of all similar onomatopoeia would also help with consistency across volumes, as well as the re-use of oft-used phrases. InDesign and Illustrator files can now be worked on natively by translators in their CAT tools, ensuring all text is even formatted automatically by the software, hugely benefiting both translator and graphic artist in the process. This, however, is not the norm as far as I know it.

Finally, slight tangent, but publishers would do well to select albums that will ‘integrate’ well in the target market at the present moment in time, giving preference to comics with less nudity/blatant sexism/racism/un-PC jokes at the expense of the less fortunate etc. would make the translator’s job much simpler.

Fortunately we had a second proofreader based in the USA at the time. She was extremely sensitive to this type of material – moreso than myself. I wanted more than most things to retain the spirit of the author’s intentions, but not at the expense of readers’ comprehension and enjoyment. We often had to ‘edit’ some of the artwork and dialogue to remove elements that really wouldn’t have helped the publisher’s reputation if parents saw what was targeted at their children. Or even if the average modern-minded comic reader saw the behaviour the author made light of in so many cases.

All of the above to say that I agree: comic translation is quite an involved process and humour does need deconstructing somewhat before it can be built up again in the localised version.

Best regards,

Luke

----- 'Re: Les Rugbymen', 15 juillet 2014

Bart,

Loud and clear, thanks. It's quite an appealing hypothesis for me because, while far from perfect, my memory seems to work on a much more auditory basis than others I know, some struggling to remember things that have stood out like bright billboards in my mind.

I seem to remember melodies, intonations and audio phrases with much higher accuracy than other non-audio-encoded information. I've dabbled with speed reading (see my review of a complete charlatan's book on Amazon...) but always enjoy indulging in a little sub-vocalisation for a much richer reading experience. I can still get through text at a reasonable pace but constantly 'hear' what's said in my mind's... ear.

I read comics extensively as a child, enjoying the hidden jokes and lively dialogue much more than most child-targeted prose save, perhaps good old Roald Dahl. He was of Norwegian parents, I think, if that made any difference, just as Tolkien (another style favourite) was a master of Old English. We also sang a lot in school. Every day, if memory serves. I don't know if any of that has any bearing on your work, but thought I'd share a little background!

I'll have the questions completed as a priority. I might miss something you were aiming for, so if I do please feel free to ask for something in a little more depth.

Thanks,

Luke

----- 'Re: RE: Website Contact:Marsupilami Thieves', 6 novembre 2013.

Hi Bart,

Sorry for the delay. It has been a busy few weeks.

I didn't know Jerome personally. Between 2005 and 2009(ish) I translated the majority of the 'albums' put out by Cinebook, but I was aware of a few colleagues working on separate titles - I think I must have been the translator 'in the process of leaving'. Had a few favourable mentions from comic lovers in Canada and in Europe, which meant a lot, as I was writing/translating in a way that would appeal to those who like to immerse themselves in the story. As naturally and engaging as possible, of course. No work's an island, though, and the editorial process meant that compromises had to be made. A few works I was unhappy with, but on the whole I was quite proud of the body that had been produced.

I would love to still be involved, but the conditions weren't right for a few key aspects. I've been a lifelong fan of the medium, so you can imagine how happy I was to find work with it. 100 titles later and life in general meant a few hard decisions had to be made.

I could fill you in on how things worked while I was there, which I can't imagine to have changed much. That is, unless they have somehow started receiving transcribed/digital versions of the artwork. In which case, lucky Jerome!

Let me know how things are shaping up at your end and I'm happy to assist.

Best,

Luke

RE: Master's Thesis

Dear Anthea,

I hope this letter finds you in good health and humour. It is, like many I suppose you've received before from those in the academic world, one that will eventually end with a polite request for your opinion! So I shall try to keep it short and to the point.

I am a (mature) second year Master's Student at the University of Strasbourg specialising in Traductologie and, ahem, Bande Dessinée. Being a native Englishman the language pair that interests me is, of course, French to English and therefore translating French strip into English is the subject of my Master's thesis. You will not be surprised to hear then that a certain BELL, Anthea already features six times in my bibliography?

The problematique I am pursuing surrounds the translation of sound in BD. That is, although it is not an audio-visual medium, it is based upon the idea that comic book authors employ a variety of paraverbal tricks in order to evoke the illusion of sound in their stories. Hypothetically, sound effects can be divided into two main types. The first, ideographic, is where the sound represented is recognisable to the reader without the need for interpretation – where either the text or the image provides sufficient information for the reader to recognise the sound evoked (e.g. classic onomatopoeia and interjections). The second, auditory, requires the reader to interpret the text by silently rehearsing the word (e.g. eye-dialect and phonetic onomatopoeia), by employing ‘auditory imagery’ or by audiating a suggested melody.

My question is: do contemporary translation strategies deal directly with the representation of sounds in comics? If so, how are the two types of effects dealt with by the translator?

To answer this I have been looking in detail at four recent translations:

1. Astérix Chez Les Pictes (Ferri) TR: Anthea Bell
2. Le Combat Ordinaire (Larcenet) TR: Joe Johnson
3. Les Rugbymen (Béka) TR: Luke Spear
4. Les Voleurs de Marsupilami (Franquin) TR: Jerome Saincantin

In praising your work in Le Coq Gaulois à l'heure Anglaise, Richet and Delesse highlight La richesse de l'analyse (p.431) as one of the key factors behind your very satisfying translations. I am wondering then if your meticulous appreciation of the source text can, in part, be accounted for by your appreciation of how it is meant to ‘sound’ to the reader? Do you, for example, read either the source text or your own translation aloud in order to check how it sounds?

I have identified a number of areas where sounds appear to be important in BD, and below are some examples I’ve selected from Astérix Chez Les Pictes. In each case the reader is given an indication of how the words are intended to be heard or pronounced – be it with a certain emotion, stress or melody:

Type	Page	Source	Target
Extended phonemes	18/7	VOUS ENTENDEZ ? JE PARLE ! JE PAAARLE !	HEAR THAT? I'M TALKING! I'M TAAALKING!
Repeated phonemes	40/9	...POU...POUSSÉ DANS LE LOCH, C'EST ÇA ?	PU... PUSHED ME INTO THE LOCH, YOU MEAN?
Eye Dialect	19/6	COMME TOUJOURS MÔSSIEUR OBELIX FONCE SANS REFLECHIR !!!	AS USUAL, MISTER OBELIX CHARGES ON WITHOUT THINKING!
Lyrics	29/6	OOOH HAPPY DAY!	OH, YE'LL TAKE THE HIGH ROAD
Inhibited speech	29/1	MMH ! CH'EST BON, CHA, MAC MAMAH ! CH'EST QUOI ?	THIS IS VERY GOOD, MACMAMA. WHAT IS IT?
Phonetic Onomatopoeia	44/1	MÊËË	BLEAT
Punctuation	38/6	OU QUASIMENT...	OR SO TO SPEAK.
Other	14/7	UNE SORTE DE BORBORYTHME?	A KIND OF RUMMY TUMBLE?

You have already explained your views on translating dialects, with which I agree whole-heartedly, but I would be very interested to know your thoughts on these other situations. For example, Picts aside, I see that you prefer to replace lyrics rather than translate them? This, interestingly, is not the strategy that all of your contemporaries use - though it is one I approve of!

There - the point made - I am hoping you'll be able to find some time soon to jot some thoughts down for me. If you can – I would be absolutely thrilled to read your musings! I can be reached at bart@englishman.fr, or if you prefer - at my home address mentioned above.

I have been a fan of your work, Anthea, since I was five years old, thirty seven years ago, when I asked - nay begged - my mother to buy me my first Asterix book: Asterix and the Laurel Wreath. I can remember her saying to me “There’s an awful lot of words – you won’t understand it” - and she was right of course, but it was the book that ignited my interest in reading, humour and history. It did not, ironically, do anything to arouse my interest in the art of translation; that took another thirty-odd years to get going and began shortly after I moved to France in 2005. Nonetheless, today, it remains my favourite book and I feel the world would be an empty place without it. Of course, I loved all the other Astérix titles you translated with Derek Hockridge too – but the Laurel Wreath is particularly special to me and, perhaps you will agree, I think it was one of René Goscinny’s finest scenarios. Please accept my deepest gratitude for introducing me to something so magical!

I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours sincerely

RE: Master’s Thesis

Dear Joe,

I hope this letter finds you in good health and humour. As it is one that asks for your professional opinion –I shall try to keep it as short as possible and to the point! (To forewarn you: there are 5 questions below which I have underlined!)

As previously mentioned I am a (mature) second year Master's Student at the University of Strasbourg specialising in Traductologie and, ahem, Bande Dessinée. Being a native Englishman the language pair that interests me is, of course, French to English and therefore translating French strip into English is the subject of my Master's thesis.

The problematique I am pursuing surrounds the translation of sound in BD. That is, although it is not an audio-visual medium, it is based upon the idea that comic book authors employ a variety of paraverbal tricks in order to evoke the illusion of sound in their stories. Hypothetically, sound effects can be divided into two main types. The first, ideographic, is where the sound represented is recognisable to the reader without the need for interpretation – where either the text or the image provides sufficient information for the reader to recognise the sound evoked (e.g. classic onomatopoeia and interjections). The second, auditory, requires the reader to interpret the text by silently rehearsing the word (e.g. eye-dialect and phonetic onomatopoeia), by employing ‘auditory imagery’ or by audiating a suggested melody.

My question is: do contemporary translation strategies deal directly with the representation of sounds in comics? If so, how are the two types of effects dealt with by the translator?

To answer this I have been looking in detail at four recent translations:

1. Astérix Chez Les Pictes (Ferri) TR: Anthea Bell
2. Le Combat Ordinaire (Larcenet) TR: Joe Johnson
3. Les Rugbymen (Béka) TR: Luke Spear
4. Les Voleurs de Marsupilami (Franquin) TR: Jerome Saincantin

You are no doubt aware of Anthea Bell's work as the translator behind the entire series of Asterix books – which have proven so successful in the UK? In praising her work in Le Coq Gaulois à l'heure Anglaise, a weighty tome that looks at Bell's Asterix translations in depth, the authors Richet and Delesse highlight La richesse de l'analyse (p.431) as one of the key factors behind her very satisfying translations. My hypothesis is that this rich analysis can, in part, be accounted for by an appreciation of how a source text is meant to 'sound' to the reader.

So my first question (1) to you is this: Do you agree with my hypothesis? And, yes or no, do you read either the source texts and/or your own translations aloud in order to check how they sound?

I have identified a number of areas where sounds appear to be important in BD, and below are some examples I've selected from Le Combat Ordinaire. In each case the reader is given an indication of how the words are intended to be heard or pronounced – be it with a certain emotion, tone, rhythm, stress or melody:

Extended phonemes	29/3	JE SAIS QUE CE N'EST PAS DE TRES BON GOUT, MMMAIS...	I KNOW IT'S NOT IN VERY GOOD TASTE, BUUUT...
Repeated phonemes	28/2	M...MERCI M'SIEUR!	TH...THANK YOU, SIR!
Eye Dialect	38/11	SALE TEMPS POUR	HELLUVA TIME FOR

		LES REUBEUS...	FURNERS, HUH?
Lyrics	46/5	QUAND MON FRERE Y R'VIENDRA, C'EST MON PAPA QUI S'RA CONTENT...	WHEN MY BROTHER COMES BACK HOME IT IS MY DAD WHO WILL HAPPY BE...
Phonetic Onomatopoeia	7/3	TNUT!	BEEP!
Punctuation	38/7	MAIS BIEN SÛR...	OH, OF COURSE.

There is also a rarer category I have entitled ‘inhibited speech’ where a character speaks with something muffling/altering their pronunciation – e.g. speaking whilst chewing food. However, I can’t find any examples in Le Combat.

Extended/Repeated Phonemes

This seems to be the most straightforward category as all of the translators I’m looking at have echoed these in some way in their translations. I therefore don’t have any questions regarding this – but please feel free to comment should anything occur to you!

Eye Dialect

As a language teacher you are probably already familiar with Eye Dialect, which according to Wikipedia is “the use of nonstandard spelling for speech to draw attention to pronunciation.” –the way someone speaks. You have used a number of common ED words in your translation: nope, sorta, gonna, helluva, doin’, eatin’, gotta and my favourite whuping –which has yet to make it into the Oxford English Dictionary!

Question 2: What made you decide to use these words in place of their standard written forms?

Lyrics

These seem to occur regularly in BD, however the Jacques Brel song (p.46) is the only instance in Le Combat. There are of course two options here: translate the lyrics or replace them with lyrics from another song in the target language.

Question 3: Which of these two options is your preferred strategy? Why?

Onomatopoeia/interjections

I counted 133 instances in Le Combat of onomatopoeia representing either articulated sounds (made by a character or animal) or unarticulated sounds (other noises). It seems onomatopoeia are one of the most problematic things to translate in BD as there are up to five possible solutions for every instance: a) not to translate SCRICH>SCRICH [p.5]; b) to translate a phonetic onomatopoeia using a classic onomatopoeia TNUT>BEEP [p.7]; c) to translate a phonetic onomatopoeia with self same TIP>TEEP [p.23]; d) to translate a classic onomatopoeia with self same CLIC>CLICK [p.25] or e) to translate a classic onomatopoeia with a phonetic one BOF>OHH [p.18].

Question 4: Seeing as so few of these noises appear in any dictionary as recognisable words –how do you decide what to put as your translation, or indeed, whether to translate at all?

Punctuation

My thinking with punctuation is that there are three symbols which have the potential to change the way a word or sentence is audibly perceived. For example in adding !, ? or ... to a single word can change the way we imagine it sounds when spoken: Help! / Help? / Help...

So, I counted (oh yes) all instances of exclamation and question marks throughout the two books and was amazed to find you had almost precisely replicated the number of both. This is notable because your contemporaries had a tendency to remove around 5-10% of exclamations and add a handful of question marks. However, in the case of ellipses (...) your translation contained 40% fewer than in the source text which was more than twice that of Jerome Saincantin who removed 18%. Both Bell (-10%) and Spear (-8%) removed proportionally fewer ellipses – however their source texts contained less than half those of yourself and Jerome.

So question 5: How might you explain a translators' tendency to remove or add these punctuation marks (!?...)?

There – interrogation over – I am hoping you'll be able to find some time soon to jot some thoughts down for me. If you can – I would be absolutely thrilled to read your musings! I can be reached at bart@englishman.fr, or if you prefer - at my home address mentioned above.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours sincerely

RE: Master's Thesis

Dear Jerome,

I hope this letter finds you in good health and humour. As it is one that asks for your professional opinion –I shall try to keep it as short as possible and to the point! (To forewarn you: there are 5 questions below which I have underlined!)

As previously mentioned I am a (mature) second year Master's Student at the University of Strasbourg specialising in Traductologie and, ahem, Bande Dessinée. Being a native Englishman the language pair that interests me is, of course, French to English and therefore translating French strip into English is the subject of my Master's thesis.

The problematique I am pursuing surrounds the translation of sound in BD. That is, although it is not an audio-visual medium, it is based upon the idea that comic book authors employ a variety of paraverbal tricks in order to evoke the illusion of sound in their stories. Hypothetically, sound effects can be divided into two main types. The first, ideographic, is where the sound represented is recognisable to the reader without the need for interpretation – where either the text or the image provides sufficient information for the reader to recognise the sound evoked (e.g. classic onomatopoeia and interjections). The second, auditory, requires the reader to interpret the text by silently rehearsing the word (e.g. eye-dialect and phonetic onomatopoeia), by employing ‘auditory imagery’ or by audiating a suggested melody.

My question is: do contemporary translation strategies deal directly with the representation of sounds in comics? If so, how are the two types of effects dealt with by the translator?

To answer this I have been looking in detail at four recent translations:

1. Astérix Chez Les Pictes (Ferri) TR: Anthea Bell
2. Le Combat Ordinaire (Larcenet) TR: Joe Johnson
3. Les Rugbymen (Béka) TR: Luke Spear
4. Les Voleurs de Marsupilami (Franquin) TR: Jerome Saincantin

You are no doubt aware of Anthea Bell's work as the translator behind the entire series of Asterix books – which have proven so successful in the UK? In praising her work in Le Coq Gaulois à l'heure Anglaise, a weighty tome that looks at Bell's Asterix translations in depth, the authors Richet and Delesse highlight La richesse de l'analyse (p.431) as one of the key factors behind her very satisfying translations. My hypothesis is that this rich analysis can, in part, be accounted for by an appreciation of how a source text is meant to 'sound' to the reader.

So my first question (1) to you is this: Do you agree with my hypothesis? And, yes or no, do you read either the source texts and/or your own translations aloud in order to check how they sound?

I have identified a number of areas where sounds appear to be important in BD, and below are some examples I've selected from Les Voleurs de Marsupilami. In each case the reader is given an indication of how the words are intended to be heard or pronounced – be it with a certain emotion, tone, rhythm, stress or melody:

Extended phonemes	48/2	...NOUS NOUS PAYERONS BIENTÔT LA TETE DU GRRAND ZABAGLIONE!	... WELL WE'LL SOON BE PUTTING ONE OVER ON THE GRRRRREAT ZABAGLIONE!
Repeated phonemes	11/8	CO... COMMENT DITES VOUS?	CO... COME AGAIN?
Eye Dialect	38/11	'TENTION FANTA....!	LOOK OUT, FANTA....!
Proper Names	-	MAGNANA	MAGNANA
Phonetic Onomatopoeia	4/2	HOUBA!	HUBBA!
Punctuation	38/7	IL N'EST PAS ICI...	HE'S NOT HERE.
Lyrics	-

There is also a rarer category I have entitled ‘inhibited speech’ where a character speaks with something muffling/altering their pronunciation – e.g. speaking whilst chewing food. However, I can’t find any examples in Les Voleurs.

Extended/Repeated Phonemes

This seems to be the most straightforward category as all of the translators I’m looking at have echoed these in some way in their translations. I therefore don’t have any questions regarding this – but please feel free to comment should anything occur to you!

Eye Dialect

Eye Dialect is, according to Wikipedia “the use of nonstandard spelling for speech to draw attention to pronunciation.” –the way someone speaks. Interestingly, there are very few examples of this in Les Voleurs: ouais, tenetion and scuez-moi are the only instances I can find. My thinking is that, since this BD was written in 1952, the trend for using eye dialect is more likely to be found in more recent titles.

Question 2: In your experience, as a translator for Cinebook, would you say you are more likely to come across instances of eye dialect in recently written works?

Onomatopoeia/interjections

I counted 226 instances in Les Voleurs of onomatopoeia representing either articulated sounds (made by a character or animal) or unarticulated sounds (other noises). It seems onomatopoeia are one of the most problematic things to translate in BD as there are up to five possible solutions for every instance:

- a) not to translate CRRRC CRRRC>CRRRC CRRRC [p.21];
- b) to translate a phonetic onomatopoeia using a classic onomatopoeia IIIIICRR>CREEEAK [p.10];
- c) to translate a phonetic onomatopoeia with self same HOUBA>HUBBA;
- d) to translate a classic onomatopoeia with self same CLIC>CLICK [p.27];
- e) to translate a classic onomatopoeia with a phonetic one HOP-LA>BAM [p.60].

Question 3: Seeing as so few of these noises appear in any dictionary as recognisable words –how do you decide what to put as your translation, or indeed, whether to translate at all?

I have two other concerns regarding onomatopoeia in Les Voleurs:

1. I noted five instances where you added new onomatopoeia in the translation - where none existed in the original.

19	5	PLICK
39	3	CRRR
42	4	CLACK
45	2	CLACK
60	4	CLACK CLICK

2. On pages 42 to 45 all the instances of the word CLAP have been removed.

Question 4: Could you comment on/explain these anomalies?

Proper Names

Normally when we see a neologism (a new word) we take a moment to rehearse its pronunciation in our heads, or even try to say it out loud, to confirm how it should sound. In BD this can be particularly important if the name is intended to carry some other meaning. For example Cam et Léon evidently refers to the animal that changes colour! However, I noticed you decided not to translate the name of the country: Magnana? When I say it aloud in French, to me, it sounds similar to the Spanish word for tomorrow: mañana.

Question 5: Did you notice this sound association of Magnana for Mañana? And if so – why did you decide not to translate it?

There – interrogation over – I am hoping you'll be able to find some time soon to jot some thoughts down for me. If you can – I would be absolutely thrilled to read your musings! I can be reached at bart@englishman.fr, or if you prefer - at my home address mentioned above. Thanks for all your help!

I look forward to hearing from you.

RE: Master's Thesis

Dear Luke,

I hope this letter finds you in good health and humour. As it is one that asks for your professional opinion –I shall try to keep it as short as possible and to the point! (To forewarn you: there are 5 questions below which I have underlined!)

As previously mentioned I am a (mature) second year Master's Student at the University of Strasbourg specialising in Traductologie and, ahem, Bande Dessinée. Being a native Englishman the language pair that interests me is, of course, French to English and therefore translating French strip into English is the subject of my Master's thesis.

Hypothetically, sound effects can be divided into two main types. The second, auditory, requires the reader to interpret the text by silently rehearsing the word (e.g. eye-dialect and phonetic onomatopoeia), by employing ‘auditory imagery’ or by audiating a suggested melody.

My question is: do contemporary translation strategies deal directly with the representation of sounds in comics? If so, how are the two types of effects dealt with by the translator?

To answer this I have been looking in detail at four recent translations:

2. Le Combat Ordinaire (Larcenet) TR: Joe Johnson
3. Les Rugbymen (Béka) TR: Luke Spear
4. Les Voleurs de Marsupilami (Franquin) TR: Jerome Saincantin

You are no doubt aware of Anthea Bell’s work as the translator behind the entire series of Asterix books – which have proven so successful in the UK? In praising her work in Le Coq Gaulois à l’heure Anglaise, a weighty tome that looks at Bell’s Asterix translations in depth, the authors Richet and Delesse highlight La richesse de l’analyse (p.431) as one of the key factors behind her very satisfying translations. So my first question (1) to you is this: Do you agree with my hypothesis? And, yes or no, do you read either the source texts and/or your own translations aloud in order to check how they sound?

I have identified a number of areas where sounds appear to be important in BD, and below are some examples I’ve selected from Les Rugbymen T1. In each case the reader is given an indication of how the words are intended to be heard or pronounced – be it with a certain emotion, tone, rhythm, stress or melody.:

Extended phonemes	31/5	TROIIIIIS!	THREEEE!
Repeated phonemes	20/8	ME...MELOMANE!?	SC...SCRUMMY!?
Eye Dialect	20/5	OAW! QUELLE RWEELLE BONNE SURWPRWISE!	WOW! WHATA RWEALLY NICE SURPWISE!
Lyrics	45/1	J'ETAIS PLEIN HEIR SOIR, JE SUIS PLEIN CE SOIR, ET SI TOUT VA BIEN JE SERAI PLEIN DEMAIN MATIN!	I WAS LOADED LAST NIGHT, LOADED LAST NIGHT, AND IF EVERYTHING GOES WELL, LOADED TILL THE MORNING LIGHT!
Phonetic Onomatopoeia	32/4	TRIIII! TRIII! TRIIII!	WHEEE! WHEE! WHEEE!
Punctuation	40/7	ON POURRRRAIT PEUT- ETRRRE ESSAYER CONRRRE LES “PIN- PINS DES LANDES” QUI SONT DERRNIERS DE LA POULE?	WE COULD PERHAPS TRRRY AGAINST THE “COUNTRY BUMPKINS” WHO ARE AT THE BOTTOM OF THE LEAGUE...

There is also a rarer category I have entitled ‘inhibited speech’ where a character speaks with something muffling/altering their pronunciation – e.g. speaking whilst chewing food. However, I can’t find any examples in Les Rugbymen.

Extended/Repeated Phonemes

This seems to be the most straightforward category as all of the translators I’m looking at have echoed these in some way in their translations. However, in Les Rugbymen you had to deal with the coach – who rolls his r’s throughout (he has a “phonic tic”). I counted 249 instances of extra r’s added to his words in the original – while in your translation there were 124 instances. This is not an error on your part – but perhaps shows how few r sounds exist in English when compared with French? I note though that you occasionally decided to drop his aitches (p.41 ‘erre, ‘ere, ‘otel) and in one instance th’s (p.15 ‘em).

Question 2: Why did you decide to drop the aitches? And, did you have any difficulty in imagining how the Coach should sound?

Eye Dialect

According to Wikipedia Eye Dialect is “the use of nonstandard spelling for speech to draw attention to pronunciation.” –the way someone speaks. This is particularly apparent in the English characters Barbara and Andrew in the book (do we all sound like that to the French!?). The most fascinating occurrence of ED in your translation is on page 34 where the crowd sing La Marseillaise:

Source	Target
ALLONS Z'ENFANTS DE LA PATRIIII-IEUU...	ALLONS ENFANTS DE LA PATRIII-IE...
LE JOUR DE GLOIIIIIRE EEEEEEST ARRIVEEEE!...	LE JOUR DE GLOOOIRE EEEEST ARRIVEEEE!...

Question 3: Given that you decided to translate French to French – can you explain why you decided not to replicate the spelling of the words?

Lyrics

These seem to occur regularly in BD. There are of course two options in each case: translate the lyrics or replace them with lyrics from another song in the target language. Question 4: Which of these two options is your preferred strategy? Why?

Onomatopoeia/interjections

I counted 199 instances of onomatopoeia representing either articulated sounds (made by a character or animal) or unarticulated sounds (other noises). It seems onomatopoeia are one of the most problematic things to translate in BD as there are up to five possible solutions for every instance:

- a) not to translate OBOLOM>OBOLOM [p.44];
- b) to translate a phonetic onomatopoeia using a classic onomatopoeia TUMB>BOOM [p.34];
- c) to translate phonetic > phonetic TRIII>WHEEE [p.38];
- d) to translate classic > classic GRAT! GRAT!>SCRITCH! SCRATCH! [p.43] or
- e) to translate classic > phonetic one PAF>THWONK [p.16].

Question 5: Seeing as so few of these noises appear in any dictionary as recognisable words –how do you decide what to put as your translation, or indeed, whether to translate at all?

There – interrogation over – I am hoping you'll be able to find some time soon to jot some thoughts down for me. If you can – I would be absolutely thrilled to read your musings! I can be reached at bart@englishman.fr, or if you prefer - at my home address mentioned above.
